The Summit at Sundance
Working Document
Introduction

Throughout The Chief Executive Program, we explored new approaches to some of the most complex and critical challenges for the field. The Summit at Sundance was designed as a space for members of the program to put it all together. The event challenged the community to use the concepts and frameworks from earlier convenings but more importantly to use each other to craft real-world solutions to four key problems: engaging collaborators in shaping our institutional agendas; creating 21st century boards; developing transformational employees and systems; and maximizing the field’s value in the eyes of the public.

This report is the distillation of that work. It is a leadership workbook, an encyclopedia of ideas written by the community. It is, however, only the starting point. We hope that you will continue this work. We’ve provided this set of tools for you to continue to hone and shape these concepts, to share your ideas and to build upon those of your colleagues.

Use this report to browse general approaches to the problem statements or look at individual solutions. Download the toolkit and continue the work with your staff and board. Use the accompanying public website to engage others in your community or the field. Continue to look to each other as partners in this work and consider NAS as additional resource that you can always call upon.

Now, let’s get to work!

All our best,
The NAS Team

About the process

We built The Summit at Sundance around a proven innovation process of brainstorming, evaluation/selection and experimenting forward. The Chief Executive Program community helped shape every aspect of the event, from the selection of the problem statements to the generation of ideas to solve them. We simply provided the time, the place and a process to do it.

Sundance was only the beginning of that work, however. We hope that you can take the process we used to continue this work.

Mapping the issues

In order to focus our time together, we asked the program participants to send us a list of their most pressing challenges. We analyzed the submissions and put together a mind map to help demonstrate our thinking about the root issues. We then dug a little deeper, looking for the shared issues and fulcrum points. Out of this process, we selected four problems to be explored:

1. Customers are shifting from passive consumers to active collaborators. Many desire experiences designed for and with them. Increasingly, cultural organizations are seeking to be audience-driven by inviting customers into their process. Problem to solve: Engage users / communities / stakeholders as real collaborators in shaping an institution’s agenda.

2. Leaders inherit longstanding governance structures and practices that can seem immutable. Consider the value board members can add to the organization’s mission, the responsibilities of board members and those of the CEO. Problem to solve: Create the 21st century board.

3. The landscape in which we work is changing, with convergence affecting structures, people and processes. Adaptation and innovation are necessary to thrive in this new environment. Problem to solve: Develop employees and systems that will transform organizations and the field.

4. The value each organization delivers to its community is unique. Amplifying (or obscuring) this value, though, is the general perception of the value of cultural organizations as a category. Problem to solve: Maximize the cultural field’s value in the eyes of the public/society.

Brainstorming

At Sundance, we generated solutions to the four problems outlined above. The participants brainstormed in small groups, working through each problem statement, exploring the landscape of possibilities and lending their insight to their colleagues. At the end of the brainstorming phase, they collectively came up with 400 possible solutions.

Selection

We designated four areas at Sundance, each dedicated to one of the problems. With hundreds of solutions “on the wall” from the brainstorming sessions, the Sundance participants reviewed and reflected upon all of the proposals and voted for the solutions they wanted to see move forward.

Experimenting Forward

We then identified the solutions with the most votes and turned it over to community. We provided worksheets and tools but the experimenting forward sessions’ format was very open. Those participating decided how to make the most of the conversations. By the end of the sessions the group had refined 12 of the concepts and set a plan for how to move them forward.
About this document

This report is a result of The Chief Executive Program community’s efforts. Co-authored by the community and NAS, it contains a complete list of tools and background information provided at Sundance as well as the 400 concepts generated and the notes from the 12 ideas further explored. We’ve also included links to original materials and video snapshots of the event to help recreate the experience for those who did not attend.

As we began to put the information together, we weighed several options to find the right mix of media. Our goal was to find a solution that was flexible and easy to use – not only the right tools, but the right tools in a format that could seamlessly plug into your own work environment. We landed on an interactive document that you can navigate through electronically or print out and use.

The problems addressed in the report affect the entire field, and we want you to be able to engage the entire field in their solutions. We’ve built a public website that contains the information from this document. This document provides links to the website to allow you to easily share ideas with your stakeholders, your community and the field.

There are many ways to explore the concepts. You can browse the table of contents or check out the mind map for each of the four problem statements. All of these will take you to specific concepts or general approaches with the click of a mouse.

Each concept or topic page provides you with several hyper-linked options. You can view the original concept sheet, connect with your colleagues who supported it, share the concept with those outside of The Chief Executive Program or download the toolkit to continue to work on it.

We’ve built this report and the accompanying website to help you reflect upon and continue to refine the concepts generated at Sundance. We hope that you will share your work and build upon that of your colleagues.

NOUN

Today, we make this commitment to each other, for as long as we exist in this community.

Each of your stakeholders’ input can be expressed as the ratio of their engagement — through their time, money, attention or positive word-of-mouth — divided by their expectations. The sum of all of these inputs is your mandate. What else does this loosely mathematical frame tell us? As in politics, the key to increasing the power of your mandate is to increase the amount of stakeholders’ engagement more than they increase their expectations. The opposite also holds true: a weaker mandate comes when stakeholders’ expectations are greater than their engagement with you.

Committing to Engagement

Originally posted on Field Notes by Theresa Remick

Problem to solve: Engage users/customers/stakeholders as true collaborators in shaping an institution’s agenda.

Customers are shifting from passive consumers to active collaborators, and many desire experiences designed for and with them. Increasingly arts and culture organizations are seeking to be audience-driven by inviting customers into their process. We look to crowd-sourcing as a means to achieve this type of engagement, and there’s certainly no shortage of organizations involving their customers in program design. Much emphasis has been placed on participatory experiences, and these are by no means without value.

How often does this engagement extend beyond audience development initiatives or one-off programs? Are we asking our customers what they want simply to inform programming decisions that will put butts in seats, or so our organizations can become more representative of the communities we serve?

Bringing users into our organizations should not happen only as a response to changing consumer preferences and habits. Nonprofit organizations receive tax-exempt status based on the promise that we will meet a need not being served by government or the private sector. Are we really delivering on that promise? Without a deeply engaged and mutually trusting relationship with our communities, how can we possibly know what needs aren’t being met? And, given that our mandate is derived from the interests of a variety of stakeholders, shouldn’t the entire organization – from mission and vision to programs and practices – reflect, and be inspired by, the community we’ve chosen to serve?

By engaging a diverse group representative of its community, the museum can make better choices about how to serve Santa Cruz in a relevant and meaningful way. And while the MAH has used this process to inform program design, C3 meetings also give stakeholders a more prominent voice in the organization as a whole. The honeycomb framework could easily be adapted to help an organization think about its community, and about how that community can inform its overall agenda.

What will you do to make stakeholders the cornerstone around which your institution’s agenda is built?
Map of the solutions

We took a look at all of the concepts generated at Sundance and distilled them into a few basic topics or approaches to solve the stated problem. Below is a map of those topics. It will give you a top-level view of the work to-date and will allow you to easily navigate to the concepts that most interest you.

Engagement \ Community \ Problem-Solving

Become leaders in community projects – seek partnerships to solve community problems.

Use trusted partnerships/relationships to build engagement.

Key Ideas

1. Each organization will define unique ways to build positive collaborative impact on our communities. Some examples are driven by community need and joining external collaborators. Some examples found organizations bringing identified community needs deeply into culture of organization.

2. We see the positioning of cultural organizations in larger community conversations as 21st century leadership expectation in order to remain relevant.

3. There is a value for cultural organizations and leaders to show up... to be present at the table in our cities.

Next Actions

1. Create a listserv or record of our colleagues’ wonderful work in this area. Need idea sharing in order for others to find the path.

2. How do we define the role of boards in expanding this role of leadership in our communities. How do we fully engage our staff to ensure succession --> continuity?

Educate people about excellence – as a “life long learning” opportunity, help build confidence and critical faculties/discernment/diversity of tastes over time. Encourage people to use their sense more fully; help them to “see;” need to develop new language to facilitate engagement.

Key Ideas
1. Engage allies in humanities, culture, health services, education
2. Coordinated “letter from the director” about arts, value in helping people to see, starting a journey. Needs to be sensory/mind-body language
3. Deploy the intrinsic value in concert with the instrumental (e.g. econ benefit)
4. Schedule another convening to rigorously build a coherent argument of the arts as developing the senses... before rushing off to advocacy. Invite allies (university leaders, doctors, etc.).

Next Actions
1. Engage allies: humanities, partners in culture writ large, accepting risk. How do you make a case for Liberal Arts?
2. Coordinated “letter from the director” about arts value in helping people see, starting a journey, the sensory/ body-mind-soul language.
3. Deploy the intrinsic value in concert with the instrumental (e.g., economic benefit) benefits --> it’s a both/and approach
4. Another convening (invite in allies... university leaders, doctors, etc.) to rigorously unpack and build a coherent argument of the arts as developing the senses... before rushing off to advocacy

Create a culture in your organization that willingly wrestles with this issue

This concept was further discussed in a “Moving Ideas Forward” session. Below are the notes from that conversation:

Key Points

We reviewed the notes on this topic and extruded 4 headline issues (below). Under each of the 4 issues, we considered the things that could frustrate achievement of the goal. Then we considered what could be done to overcome those stumbling blocks.

Authentic Leaders: Organizations need to be headed by leaders who believed profoundly and authentically in the importance of wider engagement and responsiveness to our communities

POSSIBLE IMPEDIMENTS
1. Failure of leadership strength – the leader believes those things but is not strong enough to be heard, believed or followed
2. Failure of core values & moral leadership – core values (seeing the need for engagement) and strong moral leadership from the CEO either absent or not transmitted strongly or clearly enough
3. Distractions – the risk that at times of financial or other pressures, ‘engagement’ become the expendable casualty
4. Egomaniac – the leader is so self-obsessed and lacking in humility that, though they may 'tick the box' of engagement, they don't truly believe it or model it in their own behavior.

REMEDIES

1. This is the hardest of the four for remedies, since it implies the wrong CEO may have been chosen to head the organization. Possible approaches include coaching for the CEO, or a program engaging him/her directly with the communities outside the institution, but ultimately the only remedy may be to fire the CEO.

Philosophy, Values, Transparency: The need for the company to have threaded through it, like lettering through rock, consistent values, philosophy and a transparency/porosity to other voices.

POSSIBLE IMPEDIMENTS

1. There may be no shared values – just different (possibly contradictory) value systems in different parts of the company.
2. The values may appear to be there but not embedded, or not integrated into the functions and processes throughout the company.
3. The values may appear to be there and to be embedded, but not visible to (or believed by) external communities, so engagement doesn't happen since outside the company its motives are not believed.
4. The values may be there and appear to be embedded but only to a very shallow depth so at moments of financial or other pressure the culture inside the organization retreats to the position that the organization 'cannot afford' to stick with its engagement principles.

REMEDIES

1. The cultural values of openness, and responsive porosity to external voices have to be embedded throughout the whole company in language that’s explicit and consistent, and those values and principles then modeled so explicitly and unmistakably by the senior team that 2-4 cannot happen.
2. That will often involve a conscious, high profile, sustained campaign of internal education. In companies where these values are not naturally or organically present, nothing less will do.

Inclusion (external): Individuals and those outside the company need to feel that their contributions are welcomed, and that their overtures will be positively received, even when they cannot result in actual programs.

POSSIBLE IMPEDIMENTS

1. Staff (especially but not only artistic staff) fearing to let go their own territory or artistic and program control.
2. Fear of dumbing down – the fear for some artistic staff that their precious high artistic standards are at risk, as they would see it by the dilution with other voices and a resultant lowering of their own professional standards and status.
3. A fear simply of change and of the unknown (and of “the other”), where staff lack the knowledge of communities outside their own or the personal self-confidence to handle these kinds of dialogue confidently and constructively, and therefore shy away from them.
4. A fear that some of the program and initiatives resulting from these opening up engagement programs will result in increased costs, workload and logistics – that by opening some kind of cultural floodgates a potentially unmanageable and unsustainable torrent of costly additional workload and resources demands will follow.
5. A lack of the inquisitiveness and cultural curiosity so important in these processes, so staff are simply not interested enough in these opportunities to pursue them to realization.
6. Obstructive metrics – that internal metrics favor the status quo and easily quantified indicators, and so give no encouragement or status to these kinds of developments.
7. Challenges with physical space – which may be unsuited to some of these culturally pluralizing initiatives.

REMEDIES

1. We thought the Philosophy, Values, Transparency remedies above, if done well, would make a major contribution to addressing all these challenges, where needed supplemented by inclusion training, not just by direct instruction but also by immersive opportunities to experience relevant external communities.
2. Also developing a common language to discuss inclusion issues, so (rather than taking refuge in obstructive and unsuited languages) reluctant staff are encouraged (in the end, forced) to engage in these dialogue in a positive language environment.
3. Also developing engagement-based and engagement-positive metrics, so staff engage in these engagement programs can see the results of the work validated and recognized by objective metrics.

4. Be prepared to re-envision spaces that inhibit engagement programs, and/or explore the development of new spaces, though avoiding any “ghetto-risk” of those spaces being read as “2nd class” alternatives.

5. Build internal trust in all of this through omni-directional mentoring, so staff are encouraged and helped to see the positive consequences for the company which this kind of opening-out engagement – if well managed - almost invariably produces.

Inclusion (board). The need for all of this to be explicitly and unequivocally owned by the board.

POSSIBLE IMPEDIMENTS

1. The focus many boards have (and are legally required to have) on financial success can cause these engagement issues to be read as ‘second tier’, luxury considerations, to be indulged in good economic times but suspended at times of economic pressure.

2. Some of the staff concerns may reappear at board level, a dangerous dilution and erosion of the core mission and identity of the company.

REMEDIES

1. Strong executive leadership in dialogue with the board chair has to enable the board as a whole to see the tangible benefits of engagement, helped by metrics which show the outcomes of this outward looking, porous and response positioning.

Engagement \ Operations \ Barriers to Innovation

Rethink: are our programs/missions place-bound? Can they only occur inside our 4 walls?

This concept was further discussed in a "Moving Ideas Forward" session. Below are the notes from that conversation:

Key Points
1. The buildings are fundamentally about people – not walls or objects. We should consider our relationship to people BOTH within and outside our walls.
2. We should consider other distribution/engagement mechanisms, e.g. digital
3. Messaging matters – learn to talk about our work in the language of audiences

Next Actions
1. Be more radical
2. Ask more questions
3. Franchise rather than expand

Diversity is not simply cultural. There’s diversity of ideology and perspective too.

Even if everyone is different on the outside, but they all think the same – that’s still terrible.
Tradition has produced more boards that look over their shoulder than over the horizon.”

Objective
To create the perfect board.

How to win
Advancing is winning.
Keep playing and you get better at the game.
Nonprofit governance is a continuous cycle of determining the best way in which the board can add value to the organization’s mission.
Creating the 21st Century Board

Originally posted on Field Notes by Alorie Clark

Governance is a certainly a hot topic for the nonprofit sector. Many organizations are finding that the traditional governance model isn’t working so well, sometimes leading to more stress than success. When considering all that affects and contributes to the success of a nonprofit board, how does an organization achieve effective governance?

Problem to solve: Create the 21st century board.

Within the conversation of nonprofit governance, there are typically four main areas of consideration:

1. Board engagement: How much should the board be involved in operations? How often should the board meet? What should be reported at the meetings? Most executives hope to report enough to their board to keep them engaged and interested in the work of the organization, but not so much where they inhibit the executive’s ability to work effectively and with authority. This conflict can sometimes leave board members uninformed, uninterested and bored. In Governance as Leadership, Richard Chait suggests reframing their duties as a way to keep them engaged, using three governance modes: fiduciary, strategic and generative.

2. Fundraising is also a big issue in nonprofit governance. Should a board be required to fundraise? Many boards have a “give or get” policy. But some organizations are struggling with how well this works. Should all board members have the same fundraising requirement? How does this limit the pool for potential board members?

3. Roles and Functions: The issues of engagement and fundraising can be addressed once a board becomes clear about its function in relation to the organization, and the role it aims to serve. What size board does your organization need? Should all board members have a governing or fundraising responsibility? How can the expertise on the board be maximized? Are members serving in roles that are interesting to them? Michael Klausner & Jonathan Small suggest “Failing to Govern?” (SSIR, 2005) that all board members should not be asked or expected to perform the same roles, suggesting instead a “Bifurcated Board.”

4. Diversity: Once a board clarifies its function and members’ roles, it can determine where they are lacking in terms of membership, and who it needs to help further the mission of the organization. A board should also assess if the community they are serving is reflected on their board. Diversity will look different for each board, and each organization should determine what role diversity should play in its governance. Is it adding someone of a different race? A different background? Or neighboring community?

How would you address these aspects of governance?

Find ways to get the board at the heart of the matter—deep into the mission, instead of holding them at arm’s length from what really matters.

This concept was further discussed in a “Moving Ideas Forward” session. Below are the notes from that conversation:

Key Ideas

1. A successful board looks like the following/has these traits:
2. Empathetic to artists/audience/staff
3. Healthy “score card”: attending/giving/soliciting/advocating
4. Strong board community: shared ownership of outcomes/integral to the economy of the organization/strong relationships that are mature & respectful

Next Actions

Develop a board/board member plan that includes:

1. Bringing board members close to art & artists
2. Gives them empathy/experience with staff & audience
3. Engages them in on-going strategic discussions and is respectful of their time
4. Balances all of the above with the trust that allows them to engage with operational matters, while trusting they will limit their authority to governance

Developing Transformative Employees & Systems

Originally posted on Field Notes by Fielding Grasty

Problem to solve: Develop employees and organizational systems that will transform our organizations and the field.

The global financial crisis has passed for much of the world, but an era of uncertainty has not. Leaders face an accelerating rate of change, competition for scarce resources (talent and capital), audiences with a bewildering array of leisure options, dubious assumptions about growth and questions about the sustainability of the charitable deduction (1, 2). Many leaders are helming organizations whose size and agility are well-suited to an environment with a growth curve sloping ever-upward: one that doesn’t always look familiar today. Most importantly, many organizations face serious questions about their relevance to the communities in which they exist and those they exist to serve.

In the 21st century, leaders seeking to transform their organizations and (more importantly) the field will need to be more nimble and less risk-averse. To succeed, this will require at least as much of a change in organizational culture as in organizational design and financial resources. We are right to trumpet the arts and culture field as a wellspring of innovation (R&D for the larger creative sector, inter alia) but must acknowledge that these virtues are hampered by our risk aversion (1, 2), a most powerful foil for innovation. At our best, we reach new heights of excellence, agitate for change and create and concoct amazing objects and experiences. Would that this extended to the systems and structures we’ve erected over the past fifty years or more! New models suggest possible alternatives, if not easy answers. Leaders and organizations that will be able to truly effect transformative change are those that have made themselves relevant, even indispensable, to their communities.

So, how do we identify talent best suited to meeting these challenges? How do we attract and retain them? How do we design organizations up to these challenges?
Map of the solutions

We took a look at all of the concepts generated at Sundance and distilled them into a few basic topics or approaches to solve the stated problem. Below is a map of those topics. Empower cross dept. teams to make all major strategic decisions for an organization – CEO becomes coach, mentor, facilitator

Key Ideas

1. Need to define role of CEO and understand how it’s changing/may need to. CEO involved/supports/invested/sits in meetings.
2. Define ways to empower cross-departmental teams: mix levels of staff and sectors, commit ongoing approach, implement team presentations, builds pitching skills and team support.
4. Understand major strategic decisions that can be influenced.

Next Actions

Anthony Sargent to provide senior management team agenda example. Address obstacles within your organization: long term, logistics, equity issues, assumptions… can/may contribute, CEO involvement. Define major strategic decisions that can be given over to working groups/“task and finish.” Use NAS forms.

The value each organization delivers to its community is unique. Amplifying (or obscuring) this value, though, is the general perception of the value of cultural organizations as a category.

PROBLEM TO SOLVE:
Maximize the cultural field’s value in the eyes of the public/society.

For each of the problem statements we produced some materials to help get you thinking creatively about the issues. Click on any of the items below to download a copy.

VALUE = PERCEPTION × TIME

“The Field,” Institutional perspective.

“The Field,” Consumer perspective.
Raising the Tide of Value

Originally posted on Field Notes by Dallas Shelby

Why do the arts matter? Why does creativity matter? Why do you matter? What value do we create? We should all be able to answer these questions, and the easier it we can make it to do so the better off we will be. We may be comfortable making the case for the value our organizations create, but the public’s perception of the cultural field is the tide on which that value rises and falls.

Problem to solve: Maximize the cultural field’s value in the eyes of the public/society.

If we think of public perception as the ocean upon which our organizational value floats (see the illustration above), then as the perceived value of the field increases, so does our organizational value. It is the rising tide that lifts all boats. Global Warming aside, how do you raise the ocean level?

Public perception is a tricky thing but affecting it requires effort in at least one of two paths: talking about your value and showing your value (i.e., being valuable). The latter, while certainly not easy, is relatively straightforward. Being valuable as a field comes from the individual and collective actions taken by organizations and leaders. It’s the sum of all value. In terms of the illustration above, think of the water displacement from the weight of the boats raising the ocean level.

Measuring value.

Talking about value is a bit more difficult, particularly when talking about the value derived from the entire field. It stands to reason, though, that it should start with some understanding of what that value is. We’ve all heard and read the cases for the instrumental and the intrinsic arguments for the value we create. We live in a world obsessed with numbers. Finding meaningful (pun not intended) metrics of the field’s value can help. This too is well-worn territory and the answers are not easy.

Categories help.

Dan and Chip Heath, in their book “Made to Stick,” talk about how to craft stories that stick. Their first tenant is to keep it simple. The problem, of course, is that the value we deliver is often complex and not easy to rattle off in a simple statement. In an effort to simplify our messages we rely on existing schemas or categories. They help bridge the gaps of understanding or even empathy. I might not value what your organization does but I might value “the Arts.”

Categories limit.

If you look at the illustration again you will notice the dotted line of demarcation separating arts and culture from creativity. Think about your stakeholders, your community – do they know when they are crossing this line? Do they care? While it might be a handy shortcut to use categories to help talk about our value, they can backfire. (I might actually care about what you do but do not particularly care about “the Arts” or, worse yet, I might think “the Arts” are too stuffy.)

Regardless of the course – action or words, cultural field or creativity – if we are looking to truly create a significant wave of value we must work together. How do you define the value of the field… not just your individual organization’s value? What can you measure? What can you share? How can we work to raise the tide?

This concept was further discussed in a “Moving Ideas Forward” session. Below are the notes from that conversation:

Key Ideas

1. An international campaign is needed to empower people to think about the “arts” as theirs, to engage the public and work to change the public’s perception of our organizations as “ivory tower gatekeepers”
2. Right to bear arts has to be a grassroots campaign or it will not take hold
3. The campaign could be an opportunity to allow the public to define what an arts experience is.

Next Actions

1. Set up steering committee
2. Define goals of the movement
3. Set up website, Facebook page, web presence.

Deploy staff and board into the community to sit on non-arts committees such as parks, zoning, traffic. Infuse other organizations with our creative talent. Encourage civic engagement.

Key Ideas

1. We are great problem solvers. We have the skill-set to manage complexity. We have a lot to offer new partners, but also to learn.
2. This does not have to just be senior leadership. It can and should be for all members of staff -- building leadership skills.
3. Take the leap of faith, full partnerships in your city/region can lead to a range of unexpected outcomes. Basic premise of networking. We also have the cultural kudos. We can selectively trade in.

Next Actions

1. Make this involvement part of the strategic planning process and part of performance management process. Work with staff.
2. Talk to staff, build allies, actively look for the possibilities / opportunities.
3. Lead by example. Introduce volunteering as a concept in non-arts contexts.

Replace the term “not for profit” with a positive term
Cultural or creative industry?

Key Ideas
1. Three potential “sells” -- popular usage, IRS, nonprofit sector
2. Name possibilities: social benefit (nonprofit) organization SBO  -- eventually dropping the parenthetical
3. Do we want to just change the tagline or have legal definition accept it?
4. Do we want to include entire nonprofit sector or segregate arts and culture?

Next Actions
1. Find out: Is Independent Sector acting on this?
2. What is the legal definition of IRS, who’s included, how difficult is it for us to get IRS to change?
3. Look at the new distinction for “Benefit Corporations,” consult policy makers, legal, academic experts.
4. Does the Benefit Corporation change our thinking about naming?
5. Consult branding/marketing/communications experts on strategy/implementation once we have agreement on new name and scope.

Maximize Value \ Education

Arts are intrinsic to K-12 education

Key Ideas
1. Arts education cannot necessarily be viewed as fostering creativity
2. Arts education siloed in most arts organizations
3. The preparation of future arts educators need to focus on creative

Next Actions
1. The arts sector must themselves seriously integrate education into mission and programs -- not relegate the arts to “children’s experiences”
2. Arts sector needs to develop with arts educators key partnerships that help demonstrate commitment to changing the focus from arts performance to a comprehensive creative focus

Expand the definition of the field. The biggest possible tent: creative (vs. cultural), for profit and nonprofit, personal practice and institutional

Embrace the idea that we are part of an experiential sector (& not constrained by nonprofit identity)

Key Ideas

Over the two Moving Forward sessions the group identified four opportunities / challenges around expanding the definition of the field:

1. Define this expanded field
   - What do you call this collective field?
   - What are the boundaries of this collective field?

2. Communicate value more effectively
   - Communicate the true value delivered
   - Be perceived as equal to the nonprofit sectors with which we compete
   - Make a stronger case collectively (build on the way we complement each other)
   - Be and demonstrate great relevance

3. Create real, new value through a broader definition of the field
   - Create new and enhanced experiences through a community that shares and works together
   - Break down the limits of the old disciplinary “silos” – “join the 21st century,” be part of the new world that is about integration of ideas and knowledge
   - Foster rich collaboration

4. Tackle and solve the really big issues of our time
   - Get this frog out of the pot before the hot water we are in boils
   - Address long-term impact

Next Actions

The group briefly discussed next actions but did not identify a volunteer committed to keeping the conversation moving forward and did not assign owners or dates for any next actions. The thoughts shared are as follows. The group did not evaluate or prioritize these at this point.

1. Identify the champion(s) from this discussion group who will take responsibility for keeping the project moving forward
2. Select a place to communicate on this topic e.g. a Facebook private group
3. Create a group project space as well e.g. Base Camp
4. Create a few hypotheses related to the problems defined here to test in a rigorous way – using science or design methodologies
5. Continue working on the language to 1) define the field and 2) communicate the collective value
6. Figure out a way to communicate this question and this thinking to the broader field, and engage more people in the conversation
   - E.g. Create a workshop with NAS and Chief Executive Program participants to drive these conversations in multiple communities and build a working community on this initiative
7. Highlight existing collaborations – so can learn from them as a community
8. Augment the “star chart” that NAS provided in the inspiration station for this topic – edit and augment to create a group view of the extent of the “full field”
9. Contribute to Terence McFarland’s research project to learn about consumers of the “broad field”

Goal: Be indispensable to our public/society. Be beloved.

Redefine how we “define” success. Don’t be a slave to facilities. Be brave enough to stop, close down, go out of business. Understand their culture and meet them at their place. Cultural research. Experts. Measure the effect of the arts on the brain. Make it big. Let go of our control.

Collectively capture and share the magic of what happens when the “soul spark” happens. Be brave enough to reconstruct our art from to meet them. Value is what the community says it is. Research their culture and change our communications (words) to get to them.
